DENISON, Tex., Sept. 1 (AP) — Former President Eisenhower returned to the city of his birth today and said he was "concerned about disregard for moral and legal law."

He spoke at ceremonies in which a school-community auditorium was named for him.

Gen. Eisenhower counseled hundreds of high school students in the audience to develop self reliance to prevent what he called "some far-off clique in Washington" from taking away liberties.

He advised the students to read again the Declaration of Independence, saying "I am quite sure the Supreme Court is not going to find the Declaration of Independence unconstitutional."

Gen. Eisenhower deplored what he called "the disgraceful riot at a great university last year," apparently speaking of the University of California. "They said they wanted free speech but they turned it into filthy speech," he said.

He said he had detected a seeming disregard "for the moral law and the legal" law since World War I.

Gen. Eisenhower visited briefly at the two-story, white frame house where he was born.
